LinkedIn periodically invites users to participate in market research studies. Users are identified based on non-personal information such as title, company size or region. Participation is 100% voluntary and personal information is not revealed. Would you like to receive invitations to participate in online research studies?

The image shows two screenshots of the LinkedIn account settings page, specifically the 'Communications' section. The top screenshot shows the 'Partner InMail' setting with a red arrow pointing to the 'Communications' tab and another red arrow pointing to the 'LinkedIn messages' menu item. The bottom screenshot shows the 'Partner InMail' setting expanded, with a blue arrow pointing to the 'Partner InMail' heading and a red arrow pointing to the 'Close' button. Below the heading, there are two paragraphs of text and two toggle switches, both with red arrows pointing to the 'No' option.

LinkedIn Sponsored InMails are messages from our partners with informational or promotional content that is part of a marketing or hiring campaign. These Sponsored InMails are sent to LinkedIn users based on non-personal information, such as the title of your current position, your primary industry, or your region, and are not from individual recruiters using LinkedIn. Your name and e-mail address will not be disclosed to LinkedIn's marketing partners.

LinkedIn's marketing partners may send you informational and promotional messages.

LinkedIn's hiring campaign partners may send you informational and promotional messages.
